In one embodiment, a method for recording, accessing, providing and updating medical, health or personal information related to the health of a patient includes storing information in one or more databases, the information including at least one of a patient's medical history, the patient's prescription history, the patient's medical condition, a health risk assessment for the patient, the patient's medical or treatment preferences, and the patient's medication or treatment status. In addition, the patient's electronic medical record is stored, accessed and updated, or a computer-based patient portal is accessed and used to allow for direct access to patient records. 1Description FIELD OF THE INVENTION The invention is related generally to computer systems and methods for recording, providing access to, and updating medical or health information related to the health of a patient. BACKGROUND The health of a patient is conventionally monitored and recorded in a variety of ways. For example, medical professionals, such as a doctor, nurse, pharmacist, or the like, may be available at a hospital or medical practice for periodically providing medical or health information to the patient. While this type of monitoring provides good access to the patient's medical history, the patient may not obtain updated information while they are away from the hospital or medical practice. Additionally, hospital or medical personnel often maintain a database of patient medical information that is accessible to the patient, and which may be periodically updated. Unfortunately, even if the patient is provided with access to the database, the database may not be adequate to keep the patient up-to-date with the latest information about their health. The database may be too large or too detailed, and may not allow the patient to be connected to their personal health records from 2092ce491b
