The Frontier, Part 2: The Frontier, Part 2: Trapping & Hunting By Yukio Shinohara The Frontier, Part 2: Trapping & Hunting (This article is not intended as a replacement for the trapping and hunting articles. The story from Part I is reprinted at the bottom of this page.) 12.5 x 12.5 x 3 inches; 1.5 pounds Photo: Yukio Shinohara It was my first experience in the wilderness, but it was not without some sort of trepidation. I recently began my first serious backpacking trip in the West. I had been through some of the more popular and well-traversed areas of New Mexico and Colorado, but I was searching for a new challenge. The first leg of my trip, in the Tularosa Basin of southeast New Mexico, has been filled with extreme heat, deadfall and critters that I never expected to see. Now, I am near the Colorado border, in the Elk Range near the South Platte River. My location, which is in a pass between low elevations and a major mountain range, is much more comfortable than in the Tularosa, and my only real concern is that the world-class populations of elk and mule deer could change the scenery. The elk season begins on Sunday, but a small herd of elk, my best target species, are not even bothering to pick up the scent of a bait pile set out in a small valley leading to the northeast. The hole in the bait pile is too small, and the pile is not visible from the head of the valley. While I cannot claim expertise as a trapper, I have learned that size is the biggest factor. Even if there were an elk close to the bait pile, it could not possibly see the handful of elk jerky or hooves under the pile. The size of the hole in the pile is analogous to 3ef4e8ef8d
