Field of the Invention The present invention generally relates to the field of information security. More particularly, the present invention relates to a method and system for securing server-side programs, such as database and application programs, to prevent the leakage of sensitive information such as user credentials and credit card numbers. 2. Description of the Related Art The widespread use of the Internet has made it easy to store and transmit information electronically. The loss of sensitive information such as user credentials and credit card numbers through the Internet has become an increasing concern. One approach to addressing this concern has been to design programs, typically database or application programs, to encrypt the sensitive information that it is storing or transmitting. Encryption, however, generally requires users to have specific security software installed on their personal computers (PCs). An increasing number of users have been less than eager to install this security software, and are thus often vulnerable to the loss of sensitive information. Although encryption is generally adequate for a number of uses, it may be problematic for some applications. For example, there may be insufficient room for the encryption and decryption hardware on a handheld device such as a cell phone. In addition, encryption may require considerable CPU resources, and may not be efficient for some uses. Further, even when a user has the security software installed, they still may be at risk if the software is compromised. In addition, users may not have the appropriate security software to decrypt the encrypted information. As the foregoing illustrates, there is a need in the art for a more effective way to secure information, such as user credentials and credit card numbers, before it is stored or transmitted
