Watch this video and follow these steps:Q: rails: session_id doesn't persist if a model is updated and then re-loaded I'm using :attr_accessible in my models so that when I update the model and re-load it, the changes to the session are preserved. I've made changes to the session_id so that, when I re-load the model, I get a new session id, and that works fine, but the :original_id is still set to the old session id. I've tried deleting the session, and it works, but then the :attr_accessible method doesn't work, so that isn't an option. Does anyone have a solution to this? A: Try declaring the :attr_accessible line as attr_accessible :session_id, :session_type,... Also, to reset the session_id, you'll want to put a before_save method in the model: def before_save self.session_id = [SOME_MAGIC_CODE_FOR_SESSION_ID].pack("H*") end Q: What does it mean to be an object? Is there any real point to be able to call an object an "object"? To me, it's just an example of what it means to be an OO-language. What does it mean to be an object? "An object" is a concept. It is a system level concept that is higher than just "a class". It refers to any entity that has the following characteristics: It can be instantiated, that is, can be created. It can have properties, called attributes, that can be stored. It can be processed, by an algorithm, with specific instructions, usually written in a language. It could be a "class" or it could
