With this evidence of the dramatic rise in childhood obesity, researchers suggest that interventions focused on childhood nutrition could be used to reverse the trend. "The epidemic rise in childhood obesity is accompanied by declining childhood height. This is alarming given the importance of height in health and disease later in life," said lead author Mark Fenton of the UC-San Diego School of Medicine. Fenton and colleagues examined the trends in U.S. children's height, as measured by height-for-age and body mass index (BMI) from 1970 to 2013, using data from the National Health and Nutrition Examination Survey. This information was compared with trends in obesity rates during the same time period. The researchers found that U.S. children's average height has decreased by over 0.5 inches since the 1970s. The decline was greatest in boys, who suffered a drop of nearly 0.8 inches, and in non-Hispanic whites, with a drop of 0.4 inches. advertisement The researchers suggest that the increased prevalence of childhood obesity is one cause of the reduction in U.S. children's height. Children who are obese have a greater risk of becoming overweight and of developing obesity-related conditions such as type 2 diabetes, heart disease and some cancers. The researchers also found that, between 2002 and 2013, the prevalence of childhood obesity increased by 26 percent -- a trend that is mirrored in height trends. While obesity rates increased over that period, the children in the sample with the highest childhood obesity rates -- over 30 percent -- still had shorter heights than children with no obesity, the researchers found. The study is published in the May issue of the Journal of Pediatrics. "Childhood obesity is the result of many factors, and not all of them are exclusive to the United States. In addition to increased availability of energy dense foods and the proliferation of sedentary activities, U.S. children are also being exposed to higher levels of toxic chemicals in the environment and through
