Fibrosis is a common pathological finding after removal of asbestos fibers and several environmental fibrogenic agents. Using the Asbestos Removal Model in the rat, we have previously shown the existence of a persistent inflammatory response in lung parenchyma. Because it was shown that fibrosis can be attenuated by persistent mild inflammation, we tested whether blocking the inflammatory response with an antibody against the chemokine monocyte chemoattractant protein-1 (MCP-1) could prevent fibrogenesis after asbestos removal. After inducing inflammation in the lung parenchyma of rat with crocidolite asbestos, the animals received long-term anti-MCP-1 treatment or a control antibody or were left untreated. The results showed that blocking MCP-1 synthesis significantly inhibited the expression of several chemokines (MCP-2, MIP-2, RANTES, and LIX), the number of recruited macrophages and the expression of interleukin-1beta. Despite the significant decrease in proinflammatory cytokines and chemokines and the decrease in macrophage influx, the morphologic analysis did not show significant difference in the fibrotic burden between the antibody and control antibody-treated animals. One might wonder why in the absence of significant fibrosis, the blocking of the inflammatory response

Sep 16, 2016 I was wondering if anyone knows where to find the server serial number in the RSLogix 500 server firmware at installation time on an operating system other than Windows .
