Q: How do I kill all threads when I close my script? I have a very large script that I keep running and re-running over a period of days. However, I do sometimes want to delete my files for various reasons and so need to stop my script. However, if I just kill the main thread, my script keeps going. So I have to find each thread and kill it. I'm wondering if there's some way I can do this in a batch. I mean, is there some shell command that will kill all threads? Otherwise I need to do something like this: `for x in `ps -u myUsername -ef | grep myScript`; do kill $x; done` Which doesn't seem very scalable. A: When the script reaches the point where you want to stop it, simply use the script's own exit command (exiting the script is equivalent to the same effect for a bash script): #!/bin/sh # #
