On some browsers, your browser may change this property itself based on settings or preferences. It's not a "real" property, but it is often set as a shortcut or by habit, so there's no harm in making it work.Here's the definition of the CSS property:The property can be set through the CSS property itself, through the csspropertyname:value format.For example:The other way is to use the style() function. This format is much simpler, because you're only using the single value, not the property name in the first part and the value in the second.For example:Now you just need to loop through all the h2 elements in the document and call style on each one.That's it! Here's the code: Though there are some useful in-line properties that are not defined in the CSS Standard (like min-width: 100%), I will avoid listing all of them in case a future revision of the CSS Standard is ever published.The next version of the CSS Standard (CSS3) is being published now, so it's a good time to start working on your own CSS style guide. I'll be publishing a series of articles on this blog in the future, but for now I have written a new CSS style guide for designers (with detailed descriptions of the properties and attributes used in a standard for the Web) and Web professionals. By the end of the year, it will be available as a book from Amazon.com. In the book, I will also talk about the Web Standards Community, and how its members can work together to help create a good standard for the Web. The topics covered in the book will include CSS (in the form of recommendations on which properties to use), HTML and CSS in relation to design, and JavaScript. The book is called "Web Design Standard." and is a hardcover book with 240 pages. PDF, EPUB, MOBI, and AZW3 formats are available. A few preview chapters can be viewed 2d92ce491b
