September 15, 2007 - "In the U.S., the teaching of calculus has become a highly specialized enterprise, with primary- and secondary-level teachers split largely between mathematicians and scientists. After a long history of rather general teachers, only a few are now left to teach calculus in both its levels in any detail. It is likely that mathematics educators are not going to be the next wave of mathematicians, either. Who will, then, take the reins? That is a question that cannot be easily answered in the short term. " (from an editorial in The Mathematical Intelligencer).
