Role of aromatase in the central control of blood pressure. Although previous studies have found an association between estrogen and blood pressure, the mechanisms underlying this association remain to be fully elucidated. The present study aimed at investigating the role of aromatase, the enzyme that is responsible for the conversion of androgens into estrogens, in the control of the blood pressure in female rats. Animals were ovariectomized and randomly divided into four groups, which were submitted to one of the following treatments: sham (n = 10), ovariectomy (OVX; n = 8), OVX+aromatase inhibitor, letrozole (OVX+L; n = 7), and OVX+letrozole+flutamide (OVX+L+F; n = 10). Each animal was housed singly in metabolic cages and systolic blood pressure was measured every 20 min using a noninvasive tail-cuff method. Each measurement was performed before (baseline) and after the administration of saline or of N(G)-nitro-L-arginine methyl ester (L-NAME) and sodium nitroprusside (SNP). At baseline, animals of the OVX+L group showed a higher blood pressure than animals of the sham group. OVX+L+F group showed the lowest blood pressure values. Following injection of saline, the increase in blood pressure in the OVX+L group was prevented by pre-treatment with the NO synthase inhibitor, L-NAME. SNP caused an increase in blood pressure in all groups. SNP-induced increases were higher in the sham group than in the O
