Tumors are heterogeneous and drug responses depend on cell-to-cell drug responses. The heterogeneity of drug response requires data acquisition to inform rational drug discovery. We describe a method for analysis of single-cell drug response data in the context of cell-to-cell heterogeneity in 3D. Our procedure is based on analysis of probability distributions obtained from rare cell clusters. We found that the probability distribution of a percentage of live cells can be approximated by a normal or an inverse Gaussian distribution and fitted well with a parametric or a non-parametric regression model, respectively. The fitted parameters were used to obtain the probability distribution of the percentage of dead cells from which the probability distribution of the percentage of alive cells can be deduced. Normal or inverse Gaussian distributions were also obtained from cell clusters of varying size. The number of clusters required to obtain a good fit for each drug was proportional to cluster size and inversely proportional to the drug concentration. Our method compares favorably with other preprocessing methods of single-cell drug response data, especially for drug concentrations in the low micromolar to nanomolar range.

Contents "Nadine" Nadine/Jill (the nickname Nadine assigns to herself) is an ambitious young magazine editor, obsessed with success and fuelled by ambition. She was born in London as the daughter of a successful barrister, but when her mother died the world of social pretence collapsed around her. As a result, she is now determined to live and work in a world where the rules are her own. Her early life is dealt with in the film, when she is a typical privileged young Londoner. Nadine attended a small school run by nuns in North London where she had the best education possible for a young girl, and she attends a prestigious girls' private school where the pupils' sense of entitlement and cruelty is taken to new levels. She is caught up in the world of fashion and the world of magazines when her father joins Sotheby's auctioneers and he begins to work for Miranda Crisp, owner of a glossy magazine that has "soul". Miranda makes a pass at her father
