So you gather your spirit and jump into your car, hit the streets with your eyes wide open, for another productive day of work. This is life as "The Connected Human". The Connected Human is the one who looks at his calendar first thing in the morning and sees that he still has 2 hours to go, rather than preparing his bed and quietly resting himself and his mind. Ever wondered why the promise that "You shall not want or be in need of anything" is in the 10th Commandment of the 613 commandments, when Moses created the world in 40 days and 40 nights and yet in this very same chapter he commanded his "servants" not to rob, not to steal, to lay up treasures in heaven and yet today's youth is doing the exact opposite? Are you tired of sitting at a desk from morning 'till evening, with your back and neck getting stiff, the muscles in your neck tired, your mind in a fog just when you think you should be resting or even back to sleep? Now, a team of computer scientists from the University of Washington and Georgia Tech has come up with a way to put that personal data at risk by leaking that private information through a public Wi-Fi network at the coffee shop or office. This vulnerability applies to users of the popular messaging app WhatsApp, but it is easy to imagine similar attacks being used against apps that use the same HTTPS transport encryption protocol. It's the same protocol that is used by almost every email and website on the Internet, from Google to Netflix. That encryption works by encoding the message as a string of data, including the sender, receiver and various other information about the communication. All three parties exchange this string of data encrypted, which the third party — in this case, a hacker — can't read. The data is simply a string of random numbers and characters. This ends up being equivalent to a message in an encrypted email that could have been sent by anyone. That's the kind of issue researchers such as Filippo Valsorda and researchers from the NYU Tandon School of Engineering and NYU have been investigating. Valsorda has been trying to understand how much data the average smartphone user sends when 570a42141b
