Experience-dependent synaptic plasticity facilitates the acquisition of two distinct types of memory: sensory memory and spatial memory. How memory can be separated in distinct types is one of the most important questions in neuroscience. The convergence of somatosensory signals with spatial and contextual cues allows rats to differentiate left and right in order to find food rewards, for example. We showed that synapses representing stimuli that were presented side-by-side undergo synaptic potentiation whereas synapses representing similar stimuli presented in different locations undergo synaptic depression. In contrast, if the two stimuli were presented before in opposite hemispheres of the hippocampus, memory can be maintained in both spatial and contextual cues. The different forms of memory can be acquired through different learning sessions, suggesting that they correspond to different neural ensembles. The different forms of memory can be dissociated by blocking the memory of one context with the other, and vice-versa. This complex form of memory allows the animal to remember with which context it was previously confronted and to remember with which side of the room the food was. We propose that the stimulation order determines which form of memory will be acquired, the contextual form or the spatial form, and that experience-dependent changes facilitate the acquisition of these two types of memory.

Doch das ist kein guter Tag, da kommen jetzt auch noch die Bruchteile vor die Anspannung, die sich vor den Sommer hinzieht. Im Video: Dieser
