malware. 1. Field of the Invention The present invention relates to a process for the preparation of crosslinked polyethylene. The present invention also relates to polyethylene that is prepared by said process and is useful for producing films, fibers, and medical equipment. 2. Related Art

Polyethylene and copolymers of ethylene can be made by well-known polymerization processes. However, such polymers are not crosslinked and as a result have limited film-forming properties. The presence of crosslinking in ethylene polymers can be utilized to facilitate film formation by extruding a film or fiber. However, when such films are subjected to a stretching process, they have very low tensile strength and low modulus. Compounds have been prepared which can be used to crosslink polyethylene. Examples of these compounds are peroxides, polyfunctional aziridines and azlactones.

However, these compounds are not practical for commercial use because they are toxic and because they reduce the productivity of the polymerization process. Transition metal complexes of crosslinking agents which contain phosphorus atoms have been shown to be effective for crosslinking ethylene polymers. For example, Grane, U.S. Pat. No. 4,359,558, describes the polymerization of ethylene in the presence of an organo-lithium reagent and a Group VIII transition metal complex of an organo-phosphorus compound such as trimethylphosphite. Sijbesma et al., U.S. Pat. a69d392a70
