… You must have a bonafide quote from a reliable source – The DNC will not approve any claims about the DCCC. And the DNC will not consider any phone calls you have made. Including calling your friends. The DNC will only consider letters from constituents and media calls. A friendly media call might work, but so will a harassing media call. So, how to find your media contacts? First, google under your state party. Your state party and your congressional representative's name. It will come up. It might be a campaign site, it might be a constituent or committeeman association. Go there and click on "media". Often they list media calls. The media contact information might be in the top corner. If not, look under "additional contacts". That's the goal – Get your message out there! Just remember to dress nice and don't chew on the phone As far as those "bad" voters who refuse to get the election results, well, who are they? Seems to me they're not really "getting the message" in the first place. They are instead thinking the public will just have to deal with whatever the President is hell-bent on doing in the next 4 years. Yes, it's sort of a catchy slogan, especially coming from the Republican Party, whose party now is not only out of power, but also out of people. A few months before the elections, both major parties had their membership at record highs. It was a "Cinderella" moment for Democrats. This year, the registrations are plummeting fast. The Republicans have NO CHANCE of getting back into the majority. It's just not going to happen. So, the Democrats keep blaming their losses on the voters. I'm here to tell you that a large part of that blame lies with those voters. While Obama and the Democrats keep screeching that we're full of supposedly stupid and deplorable voters who just won't get it, they themselves have done a terrible job of getting the message out. The Democrats have been so stupid as to simply shut down their entire operation in the last two weeks. The problems the Democrats now face are very real. If they don't want to look at them, and the country, as being stupid, they need to take a more open look at the DNC – either voluntarily

Brushes There are a few different types of brushes available to you in Photoshop: The Basic Brush: The standard brush for use in most tasks. With the Basic Brush, you can paint with hard edges using a circular motion for more detail work, or in a elliptical motion for more fluid washes. The Eraser Brush: The eraser brush is used to quickly remove unwanted elements from an image. You can use the eraser brush either with a hard edge for detail work or with a soft edge to remove large areas of the image. The Path Brush: The path brush is useful for creating bezier curves. It allows you to create smooth paths that can be filled with any kind of brush or other object. Brush Settings Like everything in Photoshop, brushes have settings that control their behavior. The settings are under Brushes > Settings > Brushes. When you use the Eraser Brush, you can use the Stroke Length setting to select the size of the hard edge. This setting also controls how quickly the soft edge of the brush erases unwanted elements. The Amount (brushes with no pressure) setting is used to control the size of the soft edge of the brush. You can also use the Blur setting to apply a Gaussian blur around the eraser, which adds a smooth, blurred appearance to the brush. Finally, you can adjust the Spacing (amount of pressure applied to the brush as you stroke) setting to change the pressure of the stroke. When you paint with a brush, you can use the Size (size of brush tip) setting to control the amount of paint that you apply when you use the brush. The Angle (size of brush side) setting can be used to adjust the size of the shadow on the brush side. The Spacing (amount of pressure applied to the brush as you stroke) setting controls the pressure of the stroke. Duplicate Stroke You can set the duplicated brush to apply the effects of a brush stroke only to areas that are not currently selected (you can set this for additional brushes as well). After duplicating the brush stroke, you can use the existing color/texture from the original brush to fill in the selected areas. You can also use the Current Brush settings to change the settings of the original brush. Image size factors You can use brush settings to control the proportions of the brush. For example, if you want to use a smaller brush for a specific area
