The process of disseminating information in a form that is appropriate for an intended recipient has been addressed in many ways. The most obvious method is by sending a message in an envelope. Depending on its origin, however, the message may be censored, for example, if it originates from an unknown source or a hostile source. Other methods of disseminating information have been attempted, but with only limited success. For example, in the text of a novel or the dialog in a movie, the audience or a class is often given the impression that its author or producer has been monitoring the proceedings. In most cases, however, little, if any, monitoring takes place. When the author is conscious of the audience or class, he attempts to control the message through conscious persuasion. Copyrights are also attached to various graphic works, including paintings and photographs, and corresponding 09e8f5149f
