Lubricating oils have been used in engine oil to increase engine wear resistance. Recently, lubricating oils have been used in fuel injection systems to prevent coking of the injectors. This has been done by using dispersants and detergents in the oil to keep metal in suspension to prevent the formation of a metal deposit (coating) on the injector. Injector coating would decrease the ability of the injector to atomize fuel. Stable dispersants are important for effective lubrication and detergency. It is well-known in the lubricating oil art that hydrocarbyl-substituted succinimide dispersants having two or more succinimide groups in the same molecule provide excellent engine wear control and injector detergency. These hydrocarbyl-substituted succinimide dispersants are typically made using hydrocarbyl substituted succinic acylating agents and metal or ammonium hydroxide. The term "hydrocarbyl" includes, 6a5afdab4c
