Q: What is exactly the amortization of a bond and why does it vary with time? I am studying the concept of amortization for the first time. I have always thought that the amortization of a bond is equal to the sum of the principle payments (pay-back of the interest), and the coupon payments (payment of the interest) received over the life of the bond divided by the time at which the principal is repaid. However I learned that a bond's amortization rate is equal to the sum of the coupon payments and the principle payments divided by the time at which the principal is repaid. Why is that? A: Since for small time Δt the term $\Delta t \cdot \frac{P(t)}{P(t-\Delta t)}$ for the difference Δt between the bond price $P(t)$ and its price $P(t-\Delta t)$ for maturity time Δt is larger than $\frac{P(t)}{P(t-\Delta t)}$ for the price $P(t)$ of the bond at maturity time t , the amortization becomes smaller in time, so that for time $\Delta t \rightarrow 0$ the amortization term tends to zero for $\Delta t \rightarrow 0$. A: The interest is a payment made now (interest rate i) for receiving a payment later (principal P) Some bonds (regular bonds) pay just i and some bonds (call bonds) have an option to cancel the bond and receive back P . If you cancel the bond, then you pay i for now and have P later. The amortization of this bond is the payback of the interest i . Call bonds have their cashflows in two times: there is a i payment now and later there is a P payment (the cancellation of the bond). The amortization of this bond is the payback of the interest plus the payback of the principal. A: As gvern already says, amortization is the amount that would be left over if the principal is paid off right now, and you can think of the as the result

Pen tools are also very versatile. Some are used for painting and combining pixels, like the Brush, Pen, and Gradient tools. Others, like the Rectangle or Polygon tools, are used to make geometric shapes, like boxes or polygons. There are three main styles of brushes: called "quality brushes" in Photoshop, sometimes this is listed as "Quality or Opacity brushes", which also refers to the opacity of the brush. The size and direction of movement of the brush stroke determines its type: Brush Tip – self contained and movable. The brush tip follows the path of the mouse pointer. Brush Layers – similar to painting with a brush, but on a layer instead of directly on the image. Brush layers can be grouped and removed from the brush layer history. The brush tip will then draw an outline of the group or the layer in question. Brush Pix – are non-interactive pixels attached to a brush. These can be moved, scaled, and rotated with the brush, but not removed from the brush layer history. Brush Nodes – are non-interactive pixels connected to each other. They can be moved, scaled, and rotated with the brush, but the connections to other pixels are frozen in place, making it impossible to unlink pixels from a brush. Some brushes have a "Type" parameter. Brushes with a type of "p" are pixel brushes and fill a rectangular or circular area. Other types, such as "s" for strokes, "l" for lines, etc., are similar, but cover a non-rectangular area and can be connected to each other with strokes or lines. "Sand" brushes create a grainy, grungy look. Pixel brushes are generally controlled with the mouse, but tablet users may need to activate the Brush Tool's "Brush as Tablet" option. Most brushes have settings for brush tips, opacity, and size. Brush settings may also include a "Flow" setting for specifying the opacity, and "Spreading" for the speed of the brush stroke. The Brush Tool has a history of strokes that allows the user to recover brush strokes that have been erased. The brush tip will then create a new brush stroke over the previous stroke, but is not connected to the previous stroke
