The primary objective of this project is to study the mechanisms of antibacterial action of cefazolin against Bacillus. Two modes of action are being investigated: i) lytic cell death and ii) inhibition of protein synthesis, i.e., inhibition of the essential function of the protein synthesis mechanism of an organism. A strain of Bacillus subtilis ATCC 6633 has been chosen for these studies because it undergoes lytic cell death when exposed to cefazolin. The specific objectives are: 1) to determine the nature of the cefazolin effect on the protein synthesis mechanism of Bacillus subtilis and, 2) to establish the pathway of the lytic cell death. The following experiments will be used to study the lytic effect of cefazolin on the protein synthesis of Bacillus subtilis: (i) The effects of cefazolin on in vitro protein synthesis in isolated bacterial cells will be studied. (ii) The sequence of events leading to lysis of the cells will be established. (iii) The relationship between lytic cell death and the action of the cefazolin effect on the protein synthesis mechanism will be determined. (iv) The cefazolin effect on Bacillus subtilis in vivo will be studied by growing Bacillus subtilis ATCC 6633 in a highly drug-containing medium, determining the concentration of cefazolin in the media and determining the maximum concentration of cefazolin that B. subtilis survives. The relationship between bacterial survival and the concentration of cefazolin will be studied. (v) The effect of cefazolin on the protein synthesis system of Bacillus subtilis in vivo will be determined. These studies will provide information on the activity of cefazolin against a bacterial strain that undergoes lytic cell death and on the antimicrobial mechanism of action of cefazolin. This information should prove useful for further studies on cefazolin and related compounds. This invention relates to electrodepositable primers for use in the preparation of metallic surfaces such as automobile and truck bodies and the like. More particularly, it relates to electrodepositable primers containing gelling agents which produce at least a short film of gelled polymer with outstanding physical properties upon electrocoating.
