Follow the steps to create link bookmark buttonIlluminations (Bennett) Illuminations was written in 1961 by James Russell Lowell. Illuminations is a poem of 33 stanzas divided into four sections. The poem is a plea to the reader to get up from his or her chair to appreciate the simple beauty of nature. The poem is in a minor key and ends with a coda, or a refrain, which repeats the beginning phrase to emphasize the point. Composition and reception Lowell was an expert in music and mathematics and his opinion on the benefits of learning these disciplines was shared by many of his friends. As his colleague Alexander Anderson, a poet, says, "no one who had known him for long could doubt that James Russell Lowell was obsessed with the four mathematical sciences". As an amateur musician he also felt that music helped to create beauty in one's life. In 1861, Lowell published a book entitled Mathematical Limitations. The "Illuminations" was one of the few exceptions to the book, which argued against the mathematical superiority of the German musical heritage. The book includes a poem with the same title as the book. In the 19th century the connotation of "Illuminations" was religious and the basic message of the poem was clear. However, in the 20th century this connotation was seemingly changed. In 1912 W. B. Yeats wrote an essay about the Modernist movement, where he criticizes that the word "illuminations" was changed to "illuminate". This change in connotation brings into question whether the poet James Russell Lowell was consciously changing the meaning of "illuminations".
