In recent years, optical pick-up devices have been widely used for reading and writing information from and to recording media, such as optical disks. Such an optical pick-up device typically includes a laser diode as a light source, and an optical system for converging laser light from the light source on an optical disk. For example, a first-order diffraction grating is sometimes provided for separating a plurality of different wavelengths of laser light into different directions of diffraction. The configuration of the first-order diffraction grating is typically called "first-order diffraction grating in four-directional separation". According to a typical
