The company announced today that it will begin "Newscasting by the Numbers" during the ASG on Tuesday, July 12, starting with a look at the number of strikeouts per batter in Major League Baseball. The intro to the feature will look at data sourced from sources including analytics outfit Fangraphs, which looks at different stats for batters and pitchers, and the MLB's own Sports Info Solutions (SIS). Microsoft is leveraging the data it collects to find patterns across MLB players. It also will take aspects of sports that people might not expect -- Kevin Durant will be discussed, for example -- and evaluate those outside of traditional categories. For example, how does Durant stack up against the rest of the NBA in terms of clutch stats, when he averages less than two attempts per game? But before one can dive into a presentation, a simplified version of the Newscaster will tell a story through the numbers. "In Newscasting by the Numbers we are showcasing the power of Big Data in a dynamic experience that brings important data to life through the use of interactive graphics, animation and smart storytelling," says Andrew Lewis, director of brand marketing for Xbox at Microsoft. This will be a limited-time offering to those who are able to use the new feature in real time. "This is truly the first time this data will be made available to the public in a dynamic experience on Xbox One," Lewis says. The majority of the Newscaster will be pre-recorded, but it will pause, and players will be able to interact with the data if they choose. "As a fan, if I'm in the wild pitch data world, I might be saying, 'I've always wondered about that pitch that gets hit back, it's like this and then it curves.' Well, that's a story waiting to be told," says Adam Winters, director of content at MSFTN. "It's a consumer-facing and exciting experience. And players are really going to be interested in it." Fans of the Newscaster will be able to see what other 3da54e8ca3
