Internationalization The software can be partially or fully internationalized. The internationalization of AutoCAD is achieved using strings. For example, names of palettes and other user interface elements. The internationalization is primarily done in four steps: localization, coding, localization and testing, and verification. The localization takes place in a translation center (localization company) where the software and user interface are translated into the target language. Coding of the software follows. The localization is done by an expert in a localization company. The localization and coding is then tested in a test lab. When both the localization and coding have been approved, the software is verified in the coding department. AutoCAD (BIM, BIM 360) is known to be one of the most localized CAD applications, as it comes in 50+ languages. AutoCAD 2013 introduced additional support for localization. The software now comes in more than 150 languages, including Japanese, Korean, Traditional Chinese, Simplified Chinese, and Spanish. AutoCAD (BIM, BIM 360) also supports a language pack or a language pack of its own to add (some) languages. For Windows 7, a 32-bit version of AutoCAD (BIM) is available, which is fully localizable. History The product history of AutoCAD can be divided into four periods: AutoCAD (Macintosh and Windows) AutoCAD (Macintosh and Windows) is available on both Macintosh and Windows. It was the first Autodesk product to be based on the Graphical User Interface (GUI) concept. At the time, it was the first CAD application that was not a DOS-based command-line utility. This was mainly due to the personal computer market share of the time, where the market share of the DOS-based applications was above 90 percent. In 1994, Autodesk released the first 3D software (Structural. Total Plant Engineer), the first version of AutoCAD was thus the 1st release of AutoCAD, and the base for AutoCAD from 1994 to 2014.
