The Patient Safety Commission was created in Canada in 2011 to oversee the modernization of the health care system in Canada. It is a major step forward for patient safety in the country. While the Canadian Patient Safety Institute has been a significant player in patient safety since 2001, the Canadian Patient Safety Commission will focus more on patient safety. It has also brought many challenges as to how patient safety will be defined in the future. The Patient Safety Commission has launched a 'One Health' agenda which emphasizes that the risks to patients are not simply medical risks. Patients are also exposed to unsafe environments, inadequate access to services and health system-related conditions that contribute to high rates of morbidity and mortality. The Patient Safety Commission will address many of these issues. To accomplish this, it has made the following commitments: increased access to patient safety data; better coordination of patient safety across sectors and countries; promoting implementation of patient safety principles; and ensuring the safety of patients and the public. The success of the commission will require continued collaboration among multiple organizations. One organization in particular is noteworthy. In the United States, the Institute for Healthcare Improvement has been at the forefront of introducing and implementing patient safety. The American Institute of Medicine (IOM) has also been a leader in patient safety. The IOM commissioned the IHI in 2002 to help develop the Institute's framework for patient safety. The IHI's scope was broadened in 2004. It has held several workshops and conferences to engage stakeholders in the process of developing and improving patient safety. The IHI also commissioned the Institute for Patient Safety and Quality at Beth Israel Deaconess Medical Center to develop a patient safety policy for hospitals in the United States. The IHI and Institute for Patient Safety and Quality have been collaborating on an evidence-based research agenda for patient safety. The Institute for Healthcare Improvement has been a leader in pushing the federal government to introduce new laws and regulations in order to improve patient safety in the country. The Institute's mission is to improve the quality and safety of health care for all Americans.
