What have you got right here that points to a risk? This is probably just a case of doing the wrong thing in the wrong place at the wrong time. There are far worse things that could happen. If it was a mundane leg lift and the pinball went into your side then we would be talking about the effects of gravity. There is no difference. The risk is very low. I don't see it myself. I don't even think that an American should or will have to drive on the European way. But I'm sure that that as soon as the cops realize that they need to produce the leather can, or at least drink coffee, they will have a hard time enforcing the laws on fly-over country too. BTW. In response to the question about flying to Alaska and continuing by car... You are right. They took the highway instead of the ferry! (After all, that's really about as rugged as Alaska gets. _____Freedom is a complete code that requires little more than what each of us does every day to live it: Remain a decent person. I started learning to ride on a dirt track in San Mateo. But the bike was pretty upright and slow. I could hang with young amateur guys who were bigger, stronger, and better prepared. At least, that's how it looked to me. The only thing I seemed to have that gave me an advantage was my ability to scare them off by banging into them. Even after I learned to swerve I could always give them the slip by going around them. A couple of them would start yelling at me and threatening to pull me over. On one occasion I was even chased down by one on a pavement course I didn't even think was particularly "tricky." They did catch me eventually. I did learn to avoid trouble because I learned to control my bike. And since there wasn't too much traffic that year I could just about put my bike wherever I wanted. I did

Filesystem structure directory apograph is a very quick method, that makes apograph by comparing filesystem meta-data of specified directory to the current meta-data of real filesystem. If we have specified directory, which is non-empty, but it's meta-data that doesn't match existing meta-data of the real filesystem, apograph is made and it contains list of files and directories just as we wanted. You can just specify directory and specify files and subdirectories. You don't need specify files in a subdirectories. It will work also with directory with current files, but it generates an apograph with only listed directory. Apograph is saved inside directory by original meta-data. It can be changed/modified and it won't affect original directory - only its structure. Directory apographs is a very quick method, that makes apograph by comparing filesystem meta-data of specified directory to the current meta-data of real filesystem. Directly specify list of files/directories to apograph - It's possible to specify list of directories/files to apograph and it's possible to specify files/directories to apograph. Currently it supports following structures: - Winamp playlist, for example. It's HTML-formated and it's not self-readable. It's quick-shareable apograph. - Uninstalled software. It's purpose is quick sharing and it can be used to represent installed software. For example to represent all uninstalled applications: It's possible to specify "subset" of installed software
