Acronis True Image 2018 Crack + Keygen A win for the games industry. A win for tech. A win for the economically downtrodden. Those are the three key takeaways from a study by the Consumer Technology Association in which a direct correlation between video game industry growth and educational attainment is found. "When we look at the industry's size and economic impact, it's clear that the games industry is closely tied to the overall U.S. economy, especially our economy's education component," said CTA President Gary Shapiro. "It's even more telling when we examine the digital-gaming industry's educational achievement advantage, which we defined as the difference in achievement between those who play video games and those who don't. In our analysis, we found that digital-gaming audiences are up to 30 percent more likely to graduate from college than non-gamers are." And it's not just a win for gamers. It's a win for the U.S. economy. The results of the study, released Thursday, are both a validation of the industry and a call to action. The report comes on the heels of new studies showing that the success of the US economy is closely tied to the economic health of its schools. A study released earlier this year by the Center for American Progress found that for every teacher in a high-performing school, another four people in low-performing schools gain a year of learning. The games industry is already famous for its influence on an industry of more than 80,000 developers, artists, publishers, and related businesses in North America. The games industry is expected to create 9,000 jobs this year. A win for US job growth. In terms of economic impact, the industry is responsible for $115 billion in economic output annually, while leading to a net gain of more than 7.4 million jobs, which are mostly in the service sector of the economy. "These studies demonstrate the relationship between our economy and the video-game industry," said
