The effect of anthropic pressure on the environment is both direct and indirect. The most important direct effect is of the chemical one and consists in the creation of a huge variety of synthetic compounds which are becoming steadily more persistent and thereby more difficult to neutralize. The most important indirect effect is one of the climate and is characterized by the increasing influence of radiation, especially infrared and ultraviolet. The concentrations of greenhouse gases, ozone, and aerosols are rapidly increasing and are changing the climate in a most drastic way. Moreover, the artificial growth of the human population is forcing man to expand on the territories under his influence. Therefore, it is appropriate to change the perspective of the anthropic pressure on the biosphere in such a way that it would become one of the major factors that influence man. The environmental consequences of anthropic pressure on the biosphere of the northern hemisphere are discussed and illustrated with the help of the example of the province of Novgorod in Russia. 1 to 10,000 mg of alcohol in the blood, or even less, these are considered to be "clinically significant" and may cause symptoms and signs which can lead to motor vehicle crashes. In general, alcohol is present in more than 80% of U.S. fatal crashes involving a motor vehicle, and it is estimated that it is responsible for more than half of those accidents. According to the National Highway Traffic Safety Administration (NHTSA), about one out of five traffic deaths involve alcohol. In fact, alcohol-related accidents account for the most serious injury and death, accounting for over 50% of motor vehicle fatalities. Causes of motor vehicle crashes The major causes of motor vehicle crashes are human errors. Typical causes include driver alcohol consumption, fatigue, distracted driving, speed, reckless or careless driving, incorrect lane control, failure to control a vehicle on an incline or decline, improper vehicle maintenance, failure to wear a seat belt, operation of an unregistered or unlicensed motor vehicle, driving an impaired driver or driver under the influence of

Version 1.0.0 1. First release. ============ ===================================== Enjoy and share this article! The present invention relates to an illuminated rotating sign, and more specifically to such a sign which is operated by an electric motor. The most common rotating signs are either displayed on the side of a building or window or are installed in a horizontal fashion on a building. Typically, they may be mounted on a wall, ceiling, window or other vertical surface or may be designed for installation on a floor. While many such signs are internally illuminated by means of neon tubing mounted on the outside of the sign, all of the prior art rotating signs operate by means of internal illumination. Numerous problems exist with internally illuminated signs. Because of the constant exposure of the internal illumination elements, the tubes of neon signs rapidly deteriorate, thereby shortening the life of the sign. Additionally, the neon tubing requires an exterior glass cover which adds to the cost of the sign and also reduces the amount of viewing area on the front side of the sign.
