As per the standards, if we created a package on GitHub, or any other repository, we can download it. I have been able to download a package created with the Mac version of Visual Studio (I believe it was using Xcode.) Now, how does one go about building an open source repository of extensions for Visual Studio itself? If I were to build an extension today, and release it, how would the user of that extension download it? A: You can try VS Gallery. It will be like marketplace which you can find apps to install. VS Gallery is a new centralized Windows application for finding and installing Visual Studio Extensions. You can see lists of installed extensions and add/remove plugins. As for versioning: it seems, that there is some versioning tool set up - you can see it in Properties screen of extension itself (check Post-Create events section). A: There is a Visual Studio Gallery site for Visual Studio 2017, and you can add your extension to it: If you want to publish something to GitHub: A: The Visual Studio Gallery contains, among others, extensions and is very easy to navigate through. Here a link to make sure you are on the right track: South Korea's top court on Tuesday ordered the country's president to take the truth-telling oath over a corruption scandal that has clouded his presidency, ending weeks of speculation about whether Park would finally face legal questioning or would be spared the humiliation of such a grilling. The Constitutional Court said that Park was now obliged to answer questions about her involvement in a slush fund set up by her friend in Seoul and signed off by her predecessor, Lee
