Each version is available on Windows.NET and ASP.NET. The stock market is the most powerful and liquid marketplace on Earth today. It can make you money if you use it right and lose money if you don't. The world's stock markets are all interconnected, and the market's activity affects how companies are valued in other markets (such as the price of bonds). Knowing what the stock market is doing can help you make more money, but if you aren't able to get hold of the information, it can make losing money as easy as finding a hole in the ground. There are a variety of ways to track your stock trades including over-the-counter trading, market news updates, message boards, etc. The problem is that these sources all depend on a multitude of other sources, which have its own flaws. A stock market tracker should ideally be able to update itself automatically when new information is made available, and a solution is to build a stock price reporting program that runs on your own network
