function getAllTabs(page) { return $http.get('/api/tabs').then(function (response) { return response.data; }); }
