===== dang This is a repost of [but posted by the same account. Sorry. ----- troymc Here's an Android app: [i2ei.wab](~~~ Wayback Glad to see you put it up. We still have a lot of work ahead. In many modern integrated circuits the ability to start and stop the clock is very important. For example, a cache memory system should ideally be able to automatically supply or consume data in the cache memory based on the clock. The cache memory on the integrated circuit can be accessed by the processor during execution of instructions. The processor may have to wait for data or instruction lines during which time there may be no memory cycle through the cache. To reduce this delay, the cache and the memory may need to be able to be started and stopped as required. The memory and cache may both be double-sided and have a latency associated with starting/stopping the clock which may have an impact on the ability to start/stop the clock. Also, some cache memories may require operation during a clock cycle and some other cache memories may require operation during an inactive clock cycle. A startup/shutdown is a method by which a synchronous device, such as a circuit, begins or stops operation, depending on whether a synchronization signal has been asserted. {
