**GIMP** While Photoshop is for Photoshop, the GIMP (GIMP) (www.gimp.org/about/) is a desktop image editing software package that has been used in commercial and nonprofit work for over a decade, and it is now being used by more and more professional designers. It is also widely distributed as an Open Source application. GIMP is a powerful image-editing tool, one that enables you to add layers, paint with a paintbrush (vector tool), save an image as a bitmap, select images in a batch and resize them, change colors, add text, and create and manipulate layers and composites. It is free for both commercial and noncommercial use. A reduced version called the GIMP shop (GIMPshop) is available for Windows, Mac, and other platforms and comes with more advanced features. It also has more free applications as well. * * * **NOTE** _In addition to having applications for Windows, Mac, and Linux platforms, GIMP is available for Android mobile devices as well._

Behavior of human spermatozoa during capacitation and acrosome reaction. Although capacitation and acrosome reaction are regarded as essential for mammalian fertilization, little is known about their nature and physiological importance. In the present study we have examined the behavior of mouse and human spermatozoa during capacitation and acrosome reaction in vitro. In both species, acrosome reactions were induced with the calcium ionophore A23187, whereas mouse spermatozoa were capacitated with heparin, for reasons that remain to be clarified. To detect and study the process of the acrosome reaction, two different methods were used: fluorescence microscopy to determine the change in fluorescein isothiocyanate (FITC)-labeled peanut agglutinin (PNA)-binding pattern, and the pH sensitive fluorochrome, BCECF-AM (2',7'-bis-(2-carboxyethyl)-5(6)-carboxyfluorescein acetoxymethyl ester) to detect the change in the fluorescence of the acrosome. Both methods were equally sensitive in detecting the progress of acrosome reaction. By combining the above techniques with computer-assisted sperm analysis (CASA) it was possible to study acrosome reactions in more detail. This enabled the kinetics of acrosome reaction to be estimated from the motion parameters of spermatozoa. For this purpose, the averaged digital image from fluorescence microscopy was used to identify the area of the acrosome and the rest of the sperm head. Then a Matlab (Mathworks, Inc.) routine was run, yielding the average cell x, y and z coordinates in the interval 0.1 microm. The software next determined the total fluorescence of the head and of the acrosome. Subsequently, a quadratic function was fit to the above-mentioned fluorescence values, enabling the kinetics of the entire reaction to be determined. On the basis of our results, we found that acrosome reactions in mouse and human spermatozoa were completed in less than 15 minutes. The transition from spermatozoa with a fluorescent acrosome to acrosome-reacted spermatozoa was reversible in both species; that is, the acrosome did not require time to reform after the reaction was induced. Human and mouse spermatozoa exhibited a similar behavior pattern in response to both the chelator
