In the depth of an oak, we often see what we see with most convenience. The young acorn will be seen there with every requisite to tell its age. This child, which now occupies the crown of the tree, might then be taken from the depth of the oak. It has passed through all the circumstances of life, and has repented of and recovered from all the follies of childhood. It has been a wise man and an honest man, it has been a malicious man, a visionary man, a disappointed man, a disappointed woman, a poor man, a dissipated man, a drunkard, a sick man, a dying man, a murderer, and is now an old man. With that old man, we close this chapter; he who has had his faults and transgressed,
