Fibroblasts isolated from rat dermal connective tissue maintain the epithelial phenotype after culture. Cultured cells retain the ability of fibroblasts, once isolated, to retain their contact-inhibited "epithelial-like" state (epithelial factor 1 [EF1] expression; E-cadherin) during expansion in the absence of additional factors and matrix components. We have compared the effects of standard growth factors and matrix components on rat dermal fibroblasts (DFB) and epithelial cells. DFB and rat embryo rat hepatocytes (RHRH) retain strong E-cadherin immunofluorescence (epithelial marker) and EF1 expression. Rat fibroblasts isolated from the skin retain E-cadherin expression after culture and high levels of EF1. These cell populations are not affected by growth factors on plastic, but do require matrix. RHRH are affected by growth factors in plastic or glass, but lose EF1 expression in the absence of primary or secondary matrix components. DFB lose E-cadherin and EF1 as primary cultures, but regain E-cadherin and maintain EF1 expression after culture in the presence of a primary or secondary matrix. Expanded DFB retain E-cadherin and EF1 after culture in the absence of matrix components. These results indicate that dermal fibroblasts maintain the epithelial phenotype after culture. Virtually every aspect of our lives are affected by genes. A newborn's strength depends on how many copies of the OXYGEN GENE are passed down to its offspring. The risk of getting cancer depends on how many copies of the
