Nyquist.com.mp3.Q: Choosing an Emulator for Android Development? I'm considering using the Android emulator for several different reasons. The execution time of Android apps seems to be faster with the emulator than with a handset (or any configuration). I can debug more quickly because I have the emulator inside of Eclipse. I have a different home screen, and it's easier to test layouts there. It is easier to test navigation. When my tests pass, the emulator can record those results in the console. However, there are a few things that I don't like about the emulator: I can't interact with my device with the emulator. The emulator does not have a touchscreen. I can't put my device on vibrate mode, so I can't get useful alerts
