I need video converter for PSP. Video converter for PSP was reviewed by tashikana on August 11, 2013. Based on the overview, tashikana recommends this product. Have you tested other software? This review is based on the software that I was sent for testing purposes, although there are many similar products available. Due to the small number of other options available, it is difficult to recommend any other product. What did you like about this product? I had used several different versions of this program on my PC, though all were clunky and delayed. When I used this one on the PSP, it moved at a pace that was easy to watch and very quick. I had to watch over and over again to see whether it was done. What did you dislike about this product? Of the different versions of PSPVideoConstructor PRO that I used on my PC, I have always had the same problems with the interface. It is difficult to follow, especially when a lot of the buttons have the same names. What should this software provider do to improve this product? Make the interface and windows bigger. This is becoming more and more common in the Netherlands. However, it also happened in Germany, in the past week (and a bit longer for my insured). The local police informed my insured that his car was stolen (when it was actually parked at home, for several days) and informed him that his insurance has to pay for the damages. He told me that he doesn't want to pay that cost. He doesn't want the insurance to pay for that, because he didn't drive the car for several days, he only had keys for when he was home, and what he saw, was that someone started his car. This is what it means for your insurance: the police will inform you ("claim") that your car was stolen, the insurance company will have to pay for the damages. If you don't want to pay for the damages, the police will contact the insurance company, the insurance company will pay for the damages, and inform you that it's wrong that your insurance company has to pay for it. And that's the problem: I'm pretty sure that this isn't very efficient, also because I think insurance companies and police (and prosecutors, of course) don't want to inform you by phone that your car was stolen, so that you can take action to check if your car is
