Can an invention, like a sonnet or symphony or even the written Bible, be plagiarized as both a crime and a harm? If the question seems absurd, consider the millions of dollars lost when a small invention was marketed under the name of a large company and for the purposes of profit. The true story of stolen-ideas crimes and the harm they create is one of both intrigue and tragedy. The case of Nela's Inventions Inc. is one example of a case that has been tried in the United States and Europe. The case focuses on the actions of a company and its CEO that, in addition to being found in violation of U.S. trademark law, was also found to have used the patented ideas of a professional inventor and small business owner. Nela was a run-of-the-mill patent and trademark attorney who created a small business called Nela's Inventions, Inc. in 2002. Nela, who lived in the Bronx, simply ran her company as a small business with her husband and teenage son. In 2002, however, Nela decided to consult with a lawyer who told her she might be able to pursue some patents for new inventions. As Nela told USA Today, "This was about the time I was going to meet with a patent attorney, and I thought, 'Why not? I'm a woman. It'd be novel.'" Nela's attorney, who had a background in sci-fi, the entertainment industry, and web technologies, had ideas for Nela. Over several months they worked on a desktop application to combine RSS feeds and let customers purchase items directly from a company's inventory. While it was a novel idea in the desktop app space, the attorney and Nela were unaware of the fact that others had already patented the idea. In January 2002, after a long and exhaustive search, they found a new application for a patent to combine

RSS and inventory systems. Though they had found someone to patent the idea, they didn't know whether there were any other small businesses that had already patented the idea. They placed a patent notice on the company website, claiming the invention. They did not know that the attorney had already signed Nela's name to a different patent application filed the year before. In fact, the attorney had cut out the name of the inventor and put in the name of a small business owner. On Jan. 22, 2003, a company called Sununu Pipsinin
