Self-repelling Janus particles. As a single nanoparticle has two facets with opposite charges, it cannot generally be expected to move in a fluid. However, in polar solvents, the motion of nanoparticles may be influenced by thermodynamic and entropic forces. Here, we report the fabrication and characterization of a Janus particle capable of moving in a polar solvent against the electrostatic force. This Janus particle consists of a closed-loop nanospring and a conical mesopore. The nanospring is composed of polystyrene, and the mesopore is one-dimensional, with a hole of about 6 nm in diameter, and the size is controlled by the pore-forming reagent and the electrostatic field. The Janus particle can move with a speed of the order of 10(5) nm s(-1) in water because of the self-induced negative feedback. The present invention relates to a method for displaying data on a display screen of a computer. In recent years, many portable terminals each including a display device, such as a liquid crystal display, and a processing device, such as a processor, are provided.
