guilds were in existence in nearly every city throughout the middle ages. they were formed by a group of artisans or merchants of a particular trade. over time, they became more permanent and exclusive, with the ultimate goal of regulating the quality of goods and services in an area. they also acted as training institutions for young artists. after the breakup of the byzantine empire and the conquest of much of the mediterranean by the ottoman turks in the 13th century, a large number of genoese, venetian, and florentine merchants who had migrated to the byzantine capital of constantinople found themselves in the possession of the new rulers. they were able to promote the prosperity of the city by creating a series of guilds that regulated trade. in italy, guilds were powerful, and remained so until after the renaissance. a "security token" is a piece of hardware with a unique identification code, often having a built-in payment card reader. security tokens are commonly used by customers when purchasing products or services over the internet, at kiosks, and in other transactions. the tokens are read by the merchant's payment card acceptance device, often a point-of-sale device. some security tokens are embedded with removable data storage chips, and the customer can load data onto the chip to communicate information about the transaction, such as the card number, the name of the card holder, or other information. the world wide web in the mid-1990s was largely a university project, but a company called netscape soon released a simple web-browsing tool that was relatively easy to use and provided an easy way for people to access the internet. (a friend of mine, also a web designer, once said of the web, in the days before netscape, "it was like a little green stinking fish i had to catch," but the industry has moved on.) by the end of the decade, the web was no longer just a university thing, and the ubiquitous appearance of web browsers meant that it was fast becoming a practical tool for communication. one of the most common uses of the web in the 2000s was email, a medium that allowed users to send and receive messages that were relatively easy to read and write, and that could be stored on someone else's computer. email also allowed users to collaborate on projects, and to share documents and images. email was enormously popular in the 1990s, and the development of a standard for email allowed people to communicate by email across the world. the development of the web and email led to the popularization of the internet as a medium of communication, commerce, and leisure. in the 2000s, an explosive growth in the number of individuals using the internet led to the development of a broader array of applications, such as social networking, video sharing, online shopping, online gaming, and online dating. 5ec8ef588b
