at the base of the slope i had climbed up was le havre which was in view as i took off. le havre was as impressive as ever. the scenery was good looking and detailed, with very little buildings. there were a few helicopters in the area, which added an interesting touch. I took off and immediately started a tour inland. as i circled above the city i saw the suburbs, then the outskirts and then the centre ofthe city. now my plan was to zoom inland and then slowly climb until i was at 1250 m and then go back down to 1300 m. I took off and after a few minutes i was over one ofthe docks in le havre. It was a pleasant sight, there was a lot of traffic and the channel was really busy. I could see the start ofthe tunnel that would take me out to the atlantic coast. there's a problem making the zone that i'm going to mention. a large chunk of the land around the base of the vercors valley is being used for nuclear plant testing. This is incredibly ironic given the fact that the area was heavily bombed during ww2 and the area is also a well known ww2 memorial zone. It will be very interesting to see how they proceed with the plant in this area. I would always think that the best time to take pictures of landscapes is on some kind of cloudy day or some other day when there is low-lying fog. often this is the best-looking day of the year. If you take photographs of great views on sunny days, you can end up with photographs that don't look that great. The sky and the land will appear washed out with the warm sunlight and there won't be a lot of contrast to take advantage of.
